

Jen Bailey

FAITH MATTERS NETWORK / THE PEOPLE'S SUPPER

If we are to move forward into a vision of a more pluralistic society, we must, must set about the project of healing the deep wounds and ruptures in our communities. We must go about the work of reweaving the American fabric back together again, by centering social healing, and care and truth. At Faith Matters Network, we begin by answering the question, what needs healing here? If we are to build an interdependent, pluralistic society, in which everyone is deeply provided for, we know that an ethic of care, of tenderness, of love, and accompaniment have to be central and our formulations of how we approach social change.

I see a future where everyone sees themselves as co-creators of a new American dream, a dream in which, regardless of where you come from, or who you come from, you belong and are seen as valuable to the American project.

NEW PLURALISTS