AMERICAN IMMIGRATION COUNCIL

Over the past several years, America's culture wars have intensified, and the variety of in-group versus out-group battles underway are eroding our sense of common purpose and national unity.

We are caught in dangerous zero-sum thinking, where we believe if one group gets a leg up, another is left behind. We are at a crossroads. At every level of American life, we see fractures, dividing lines, and deep pain and anger.

America needs to heal old wounds, and we need to fix unjust systems. And we start to do this by co-creating new structures together. We must build our trust in one another, and we must repair our social fabric so we can solve our common problems. This is not easy work, but it's necessary work. And it's foundational work. I do this, because I see a future for myself, for my son, Ali, and for his future children, where we live in a just and pluralistic society. One where everyone is valued, respected, and belongs.
